[dmc-related-post-wp-at-right position="left" title="Outside the beltway"] According to a recent study published in the CDC's American Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology, three cases of Zika have been reported in the United States. The CDC has named the Zika virus as the cause of microcephaly in at least two cases of babies born with Zika symptoms. The A-JOG study found that of the two million Americans infected with the Zika virus, 99% were infected as a result of mosquitoes. This study also found the rate of sexual transmission is very low, although it is certainly still possible. “No study has evaluated sexual transmission of Zika virus, but given the large number of cases in the continental United States, there is an important risk,” Dr. Nancy Messonnier, director of the CDC’s National Center for Immunization and Respiratory Diseases told reporters on a press call on Friday. The CDC currently recommends that men who have been sexually active with a Zika-infected partner also wear a condom, as well as women who have been sexually active with a Zika-infected partner also use a condom. No large-scale population testing has been conducted as to determine the extent of the sexual transmission of Zika, but anecdotal evidence is beginning to emerge suggesting that Zika infection of the male reproductive system, may not be as rare as many have assumed. “We have received reports from women infected with the Zika virus about their partners becoming pregnant. This is not a common complication, but is a risk that has not previously been reported,” Dr. Messonnier said. In what may be a first, the CDC has begun to collect information from doctors who have been treating Zika patients. The CDC is also currently in the process of gathering information from pregnant women who were infected
