The interplay between genome 3D organization and the cell cycle has been shown in many organisms and is associated with the functions of proteins, however the precise relationships between these two phenomena are unknown. To address this, we analyzed the association of centromeres and telomeres with the nuclear lamina, as well as the spatial relationship of telomeres and the nuclear lamina, during mitosis in HeLa cells. We demonstrate here that telomeres and centromeres, independently of the orientation of their chromosomes with respect to the metaphase plate, are enriched in the nuclear lamina, as are the interchromosomal domains in vicinity of the centromeres. Telomeres are also enriched in the lamina during the anaphase and telophase stages of the cell cycle. Moreover, we demonstrate the presence of some free telomeres in the lamina of the lamina-positive cells. This enrichment is dependent on the presence of the lamin A/C,  $\alpha$ -satellite DNA and CENP-A/H3.4/H4 histone variants, whereas the enrichment of centromeres in the lamina is dependent on the presence of the Centrom d4474df7b8
