When I play a game, I become so immersed in the experience that I don't really see the game as anything but a part of my life. I'm always ready to take a break, but at the same time, I feel like I'm getting more out of it. It's possible for me to see a game as a tool of a different kind of creativity, like art or a piece of music. But when I play games, I've always felt like it's a different form of expression, and it's very hard to separate the two. When I talk about games, it's not just me talking. It's me talking about part of myself, so I never really know if I'm being rational, but I guess it doesn't really matter much, since there's no real feedback process. But even if I don't know where I'm going with it, I guess it's important for the game industry that someone at least tries to get a handle on it, because ultimately it's not a trivial issue. When I started designing games, I thought that if I played them, it would just be one more thing to do. And maybe if I started playing more and more, it would help me with it. But I never really have. It's not that I can't feel like it's a different kind of expression; it's just that it always feels very specific, and that the act of playing a game doesn't make me get that. The closest I've ever come is sitting in a room with a bunch of other people playing games, but even in those cases I don't really feel the same. So, I guess

I.C.C., supra, upon which plaintiff relies, clearly rest on the theory that the regulation was designed to protect shippers from misfortunes on the road. The line of authority cited by the court in Brooks and the logic of that case, are not applicable here. The regulation here is aimed at protecting the common carrier from claims resulting from shippers' negligence. To hold that the absence of a security requirement in this situation was 'arbitrary and capricious' would undermine the purpose of the regulation. 24 It is undisputed that had the regulations been enforced, plaintiff would not have suffered any harm. The regulation was therefore properly applied in the instant case. The District Court correctly granted summary judgment to the defendant. Its decision is affirmed.
